You recognize them now that you have been there—languid bodies loved and lost every body movement fluid like limbs surrendered by bones.

There is no language in limbo, a monitored island of alarms that speaks in foreign voice to all but the significant others who never expect it to end.

Time is measured by visiting hours—bodies come and go, leave spouses stunned and speechless. Can anyone tell who is more lifeless?

For those who reach this island home foreign voices can be heard only by those remaining, whatever moment they are in.

—Henry Langhorne, MD

Dr. Langhorne (AOA, Tulane University, 1957) is a retired cardiologist living in Pensacola, FL. He is a member of The Pharos Editorial Board. His E-mail address is bardwhl@aol.com.